Consent in the Digital World

Hey [Child's Name],

I wanted to have a quick chat about something really important. You know how we always talk about asking permission before borrowing something or entering someone's room? The online world has its own version of that.

Whenever someone, even if they're a friend, asks you to share a photo, any of your personal information, or even something about someone else, it's super essential to think about whether you're comfortable with it. And if anything ever feels a little off or uncertain, please know you can always come to me. We can chat about it, figure it out together, and decide the best action to take.

And just like how we wouldn't want someone to share our secrets without asking us, we should never share something about someone else online without their permission. It's all about treating others the way we'd like to be treated, even when we're online.

Remember, the internet can be a fun place, but it's also essential to protect our privacy and that of our friends. So, promise me, if you're ever in doubt about sharing something, you'll come to me, okay?
